Ultimate Combat is a combat training simulator for the real world. Each levels focus on a different aspect of military training. This includes how to ambush, defend, move, communicate, and prepare for combat. The influence of phospholipase A2 on the blood-brain barrier permeability of 5,6-epoxy-L-lyxose. 5,6-Epoxy-L-lyxose (EL), a glycosylated intermediate of heparin and heparan sulfate, possesses antithrombotic and antiplatelet activities. EL is a potent inhibitor of platelet activation, but its effects on the blood-brain barrier (BBB) are unknown. To characterize the effects of EL on the BBB, intravenous injection of [14C]sucrose was used as a marker for the paracellular transport. The transport of the tracer across the BBB in control rats and in rats pretreated with different doses of EL was compared. Subcutaneous pretreatment with EL (50-1000 mg/kg) resulted in a significant dose-dependent decrease in the brain-to-blood transport of [14C]sucrose. The maximum inhibition of the transport (up to 60%) was observed at 300 mg/kg of EL. The blood to brain transport ratio was decreased by 32% after 50 mg/kg of EL and by 40% after 100 mg/kg of EL. The transport ratio was restored to control values (36% of the controls) after 300 mg/kg of EL. Inhibition of the transport of [14C]sucrose was maximal in 10 min and remained unchanged for up to 4 h. Intravenous pretreatment with a phospholipase A2 inhibitor, mepacrine, inhibited the transport of [14C]sucrose by approximately 30%, and intravenous pretreatment with indomethacin, a cyclooxygenase inhibitor, did not affect the transport. These results indicate that the transcellular transport of [14C]sucrose across the BBB is increased during inflammation, but is not affected by selective inhibition of cyclooxygenase activity. The results also suggest that EL 82157476af
