Writer's block, also known as 'brain fog' or 'mental fog', is when a writer cannot work because he or she has no idea what to write next or how to continue their story. In this blog post, we'll discuss various methods you can use to overcome writer's block and get your creativity flowing again! We'll cover the different types of blocks you may encounter and some proven remedies for each type. A very common block that writers get is when you get stuck thinking of a perfect title for your work. In this type of block, you get an idea for a novel/story/article, but cannot think of a good title to go with it. If you're suffering from this type of writer's block, try to be as descriptive as possible when naming your pieces. Don't just name it something like "My Novel" or "The Short Story". It's better if you name it something like "My Epic Fantasy Adventure" or "The Secret Love Affair That Almost Got Me Hanged", which will help your pieces stand out to potential readers and make you more likely to actually finish writing the piece. Another common type of writer's block is when you run out of ideas for your piece or simply can't come up with any more ideas. The best way to overcome this type of writer's block is to brainstorm as much as you can. Download a piece of paper and start scribbling down your ideas. If you're working on a story, it's best that you keep track of the scenes that are already complete, but if you're working on articles or essays, just write everything down. As long as they don't result in too many pages, do not worry about the quantity of pages written so far. You can always trim your words later on. The main point of the brainstorming session is to let your imagination run wild. So if you come up with anything, write it down. Even if you think it's silly or non-sensical, write it down anyway. Another method of overcoming writer's block is to take a break from writing for a bit. Go for a walk, play video games, call your friends, go outside and just breathe in some fresh air for a bit. When you come back to writing later on, you'll have gotten new ideas from your time away from the keyboard and be eager to start writing again! A third method of overcoming writer's block is to read something else besides fanfiction for a change. Go read an original work of fiction instead of reading the same fanfiction over and over again. When you do this, you'll get new ideas from the original work. This is because your brain associates the new story with what you already know of your fandom, so it will be easier to come up with more ideas for your own story. It's also a good idea to try reading books of different genres than books that are related to your fandom. For example, if you're writing on "Dragonball Z", maybe try reading some science fiction books instead (or on par with it like "Star Wars").
